Maud’s first novel, The Black Angels, was published in 1926 by the John Day Company of New York, the first publisher to see it. Maud began research for her first novel in the summer of 1924, spending hours in the archives at the Minnesota Historical Society reading newspapers, magazines, memoirs and Folwell’s History of Minnesota. The story takes place in the fictional Cloudman, Minnesota (Mankato, Minnesota), and opens in the days before the Civil War. In interviews Maud said the idea for the plot came from a family legend of her Uncle Frank, who ran away from home and joined an opera troupe. She based the character of Alex on her uncle, but the fictional opera troupe was based on the Andrews Opera Company, a family concert/opera troupe from the Mankato area.

Maud Hart Lovelace’s Volume Goes on Market

New York, October — Another Minnesota author makes her bow to the American public today. The new author is Maud Hart Lovelace, who was born in Mankato and whose present home is Lake Minnetonka and the first novel she presents to the fiction world is “The Black Angels” published by the John Day Company of New York.

Minnesota of the late pioneer days furnished Mrs. Lovelace with the inspiration and setting for her book. The story of the Black Angels relates the picturesque adventures of a family of black-haired youngsters who take possession of the old covered wagon in which their rugged Scottish father had invaded the Minnesota wilds and set out as an “operatic and concert troupe” wandering over the frontier country.

Interviewed in the New York office of her publishers, Mrs. Lovelace said in reference to The Black Angels, “The romance of Minnesota has been neglected. Modern realistic novels have not been fair to us. The Middle West has been pictured as harsh and dreary country and the fine traditions of the past have been overlooked for surface defects. Minnesota is a beautiful state with a fascinating history. From the time of the pioneer conquest down through the more gracious days of the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, Minnesota’s past affords a goldmine of material for the novelist. It is some small portion of this material that I have used in The Black Angels, which covers the sixties, seventies and eighties, and I expect to write other stories later that will also deal with the old days here”

"Newspaper files of half a century back aided me in securing the information I needed for The Black Angels”, Mrs. Lovelace said, “and of course I’ve always been interested in the early years of the state’s development, the time when our towns were lumber camps and fur-trading posts, and our cities struggling new settlements. That whole period seems to me to be full of romance, and that’s why [sic] I’ve tried to express in my book. I hope that I have succeeded in giving young Minnesota its true color.”

Warrington Johnson books to replicate the books found in the Hart home as described by Maud Hart Lovelace: Wee MacGregor, Editha’s Burglar Jordan, When Knighthood was in Flower, Lamplighter, Helen’s Babies, Tanglewood Tales for Girls and Boys, Beloved Vagabond, Beside the Bonnie Brier Bush, Lucile, Helmet of Navarre, Beautiful Joe, Ivonhoe, Black Beauty, Five Little Pippins, Uncle Tom’s Cabin, Wide, Wide World, and John L. Stoddard’s Lectures, post card of Uncle Tom’s Cabin, Wide, Wide World, such a glamorous (at least from a 12-year-old’s perspective) life. As I sat in my mother’s chair in the living room, legs flung over the armrest, I saw how Betsy was transformed (just as I wished I would be someday soon) from a sturdy Lois Lenski illustration to a glamorous young woman drawn by Vera Neville. There were boys, there were dances and there were high school hijinks. There were also some shocks: The Rays had moved from Hill Street, Tib had moved from Deep Valley and dreamboat Herbert Humphreys was suddenly a boy with whom Betsy and Tacy were hanging out daily!

A Betsy-Tacy Fan Cuts Cross-Country
I am just back from a magical weekend in Mankato, where I visited Betsy’s and Tacy’s houses, sat on the famous bench with my sister, admired our paver stone, looked in awe at the “chocolate-covered house,” wandered in the Carnegie Library, saw what that sleeping porch on the Sibley house really looks like, gazed out over Murmuring Lake from the famous bay window and visited the grave of Maud Hart Lovelace.

While I was at this year’s Betsy-Tacy Convention, which was so amazing, many fellow Betsy-Tacy fans and new friends thanked me for the forthcoming reissues of books 5 through 10 this fall, but what I don’t think they quite comprehended was this: My interest in reissuing the books is purely selfish, as I have been a Betsy-Tacy fan as long as I have been reading.

I don’t remember exactly when I started reading the early books, but I read and reread the first four books faithfully – and had sand stores in my backyard, made fudge, and wrote stories just like Betsy (though I was too much of a wimp to climb a tree).

I reread the first four books regularly, as our mother didn’t immediately tell me about the high school books, thinking, I guess, that they’d be too mature for me at the tender age of 12.

I remember so distinctly the day that I opened up Heaven to Betsy—quite honestly – I was unbelievably excited to find out that the books continued. Not only that, but Betsy now lived such a glamorous (at least from a 12-year-old’s perspective) life.

As I sat in my mother’s chair in the living room, legs flung over the armrest, I saw how Betsy was transformed (just as I wished I would be someday soon) from a sturdy Lois Lenski illustration to a glamorous young woman drawn by Vera Neville. There were boys, there were dances and there were high school hijinks. There were also some shocks: The Rays had moved from Hill Street, Tib had moved from Deep Valley and dreamboat Herbert Humphreys was suddenly a boy with whom Betsy and Tacy were hanging out daily!

I reread the high school books from that day forward, taking them with me to college, and eventually to New York, where I moved after school to work in publishing. In times of happiness I read them, and in times of sadness they were the book form of the ultimate comfort food.

My sister Becky was equally obsessed with Betsy-Tacy. And though we are different in many ways (to put it most plainly: She’s a Red Sox fan and I’m a Yankees fan), “with that perfect accord which characterizes our relationship,” on the Betsy-Tacy books we have always agreed.

Because we shared this love for the tomes, we never thought we were the only one, but we definitely thought we were the only two people who knew about them. The copies we read over and over were those from the Nashua Public Library in Nashua, N.H. We're pretty much convinced that between the two of us we kept those copies circulating. To this day we know exactly where they are in the library – and if you open any of them up, chances are you’ll find traces of the fudge we used to make while reading them.

When I began working at Harper Collins, I was thrilled to be at the house that published Betsy, though I was not in the children's division. I did not realize at that time how I would be able to play a part in Maud's legacy.

When I learned last summer from the fabulous librarian Nancy Pearl that the books were in need of reissuing, I proposed that we publish the tomes as Harper Perennial Modern Classics, a line of books that includes Harper Lee's To Kill a Mockingbird and Betty Smith's A Tree Grows in Brooklyn, and miraculously, I became the “editor” of a series of books that has long meant more to me than nearly anything else I've read.

When it came time to concept the cover designs, I felt there was no other option than to incorporate the original artwork by Vera Neville into them. (And thanks go to my sister, who has a full set of dust-jacketed copies that we were able to scan for the artwork.) Since each book will contain two of the tomes, the artwork for the book that is not featured on the front will appear on the spine of the book.

The new forewords came easily as well. Meg Cabot had already agreed to speak at this year’s convention, so I knew she was a fan, and I learned that Laura Lippman had also recently told Time magazine that the books were among her favorites. I think that fans will love what each of them has written, and they perfectly complement Anna Quindlen’s foreword as well.

I owe incredible thanks to Julie Schrader at the Betsy-Tacy Society for providing originals of the many archival photos contained in the back of the books, to Barbara Carter at the Maud Hart Lovelace Society, and to Andrea Shaw, literary executor of Maud’s estate, who visited my office with five of Maud’s photo albums in tow for me to browse through and scan.

Going through those photo albums was possibly the emotional highlight of my career, and to look at them with Andrea was so illuminating – she pointed out how Maud was rarely photographed with her teeth showing, she so hated those teeth parted in the middle. And there were also some holes on those pages that Andrea pointed out – most likely photos that Maud didn’t feel were flattering, so they were removed because she knew people would be looking through them one day.

But the people to whom I owe the greatest thanks are all the members of the Betsy-Tacy Society, the Maud Hart Lovelace Society and the Maud-L listserv for all that they have done over the years to keep Maud’s legacy alive. It’s truly an honor to find myself in a position to now be able to do my part.

My sister and I had long talked about making a pilgrimage to Mankato or to one of the conventions, and when we learned the convention was happening this summer, the year of the books’ reissue, I called her and said, “Well, if we’re ever going to go, now is the time.” I am so thankful that we did. It was magical not only to see sites for ourselves, but to witness firsthand the passion that everyone has for the tomes. I look forward to working with BT fans across the country to celebrate the books’ publication on September 29th, and I remain,

Your obedient servant,

Jennifer Hart

Cemetery Flower Fund

A permanent flower urn was installed at the gravesite of Maud Hart Lovelace by the Betsy-Tacy Society this summer. Maud loved flowers, and it will be a tribute from all of her fans to be remembered with flowers each summer. Initial costs were $180 for the cement pad, wrought iron stand with planter, flowers, and all summer water maintenance. Thanks to donations by Kathleen Baxter and Connie Fahling, we have already raised $100 of the initial costs.

Future annual costs will be $75 for planting and maintenance. We also have the option (for an additional fee) to have a wreath placed at the gravesite during the holidays.

To contribute to the Cemetery Flower Fund, you can send a check to the Betsy-Tacy Society, P.O. Box 94, Mankato, MN 56002-0094. Or make a donation online through the BTS shop site using PayPal - just include a note designating your donation to the Cemetery Flower Fund.

Paver Fundraiser

There is still time to get your name in stone or to give this as a gift in honor or memory of your loved ones. An order form can be downloaded from our website. This fundraiser will continue until the entire walkway by Betsy’s house is filled with engraved pavers! Blank pavers are replaced by engraved pavers as the orders come in. All proceeds from the paver sales benefit Betsy’s House Restoration Fund.

Breaking News!

BTS to Receive Lovelace Artifacts and Documents

Within the coming months, the Betsy-Tacy Society will be receiving artifacts and collections from the estate of Merian Lovelace Kirchner. Stay tuned for more information as it becomes available.

Betsy-Tacy Society Website Gets a New Look!

After months of preparation, the BTS launched a new redesigned website in June. The new site offers more information and is easier to navigate. We also have the added benefit of a “members only” page. Members just need to create a password to enter this page. On this page we will post the Deep Valley Sun and other special articles and member information. A “Learn about Maud” page features a wide variety of information about Maud and her books, children’s activities, teachers guides, book clubs, parties and games and more. You can keep up to date with our restoration projects and get information on tours and open hours. And don’t forget to check out our shop!

Betsy-Tacy Book Club

The Betsy-Tacy Book Club is open to children ages 7-12, with club size limited to 10. A new club will begin this fall. Meetings are once a month for 5 consecutive months, and members will read the first four books in the Betsy-Tacy series. There will be book discussions, as well as crafts and snacks all taken from the Betsy-Tacy books. To register or for more information, visit the website: www.betsy-tacysociety.org, call 507-345-9777 or email: julie@betsy-tacysociety.org. If you don’t live in the area and want to begin your own Betsy-Tacy Book Club, just contact us for ideas and we’ll help you get started.
Betsy’s House Mortgage News

Our goal of burning the mortgage was achieved in April 2009!

Thank you to all who have supported the Betsy-Tacy Society with your memberships and donations over the years. We have achieved this milestone together! Thank you!

Of course, this achievement deserves a celebration. Everyone is invited to attend the Mortgage Burning Celebration on Sat., October 17, 2009. Watch our website for details.

In recognition and appreciation to those who generously gave to the Burn the Mortgage fund 2007-2009.

Don’t forget - Betsy’s House ornament or the Betsy-Tacy afghan make a wonderful gift!
The 2009 Betsy-Tacy Convention, which drew just over 200 attendees, took place July 17–20. Fans came from 31 states and Canada, and from as far away as France to spend the weekend in Deep Valley, enjoying a wide array of Betsy-Tacy activities.

The highlight of this year’s convention was the keynote address on the convention’s final morning by another prolific author, beloved by today’s generation of girls: Meg Cabot (The Princess Diaries). Meg has been a huge fan of the Betsy-Tacy books since she first read them at age 30 and has written the foreword to the new reprint Harper Perennial Modern Classics edition of Betsy Was a Junior/Betsy & Joe. She donated her time for the convention, and we’re very grateful for her enthusiastic support of the BTS.

Willard’s Emporium silent auction raised $4,300 for the Betsy-Tacy Restoration Fund, and convention souvenirs raised an additional $650 in funds for the BTS!

Thanks to the Betsy-Tacy Convention committee, for their much needed fund-raising efforts on our behalf. Convention committee members are: Kathy Baxter, Michele Blake, Radhika Braeden (committee chair), Julie Chuba, Barb Fecteau, Shelby Kirchner, Colleen O’Neil, Kelly Reuter, Jan Sasser, Steffi Smith, and Kristin Woizeshke. Thanks to the many other Betsy-Tacy volunteers who helped plan and prepare for the event. Thanks also to event planner, Kaaren Keohane and to Mary Brown and her staff at the Alltel Center. We also appreciate the dedicated local volunteers who worked in preparation for and during the convention.

Thank you all for your donations, memberships, and gift shop purchases. This generous support of the BTS helps us restore, maintain and keep these historic houses open for the public to enjoy!

Message from Meg Cabot….

I had a fantastic time at the Betsy-Tacy Convention this year, and can’t thank Kathleen Baxter enough for inviting me. It was such a joy to get to speak with so many enthusiastic readers who love the books as much as I do, but also to get to visit Betsy’s and Tacy’s homes, which have been so lovingly restored and exquisitely preserved by the Betsy-Tacy Society. It was awe-inspiring actually to walk in the same rooms that Maud Hard Lovelace lived and wrote in, to see some of the things she owned and touched, and of course sit on “the bench!” I’ll carry fond memories of my trip to Mankato and my visit with the Betsy-Tacy Society and to Maud's home with me for many years to come.

Meg Cabot

Leave a Legacy

We all leave our own unique mark on this world in our families, work and the organizations we believe in and support. We celebrate these legacies at BTS – after all, this is the heart of the history we are passionately working to preserve every day.

A legacy gift, also known as a planned or estate gift, can help ensure the Betsy-Tacy Society has the resources to preserve and promote the legacy of Maud Hart Lovelace and her works for future generations. If you are also thinking about the future, please consider a legacy gift to help ensure BTS has the resources to preserve these historic literary houses (childhood homes of Maud Hart Lovelace and Frances “Bick” Kenney) and the precious Lovelace artifacts and archives for many years to come.

The Betsy-Tacy Society is a member of LEAVE A LEGACY® Mankato Area, which is a collaborative effort to educate the public and promote the idea of giving through bequests and estate plans by increasing awareness of and interest in charitable-giving options.

To learn more about giving opportunities, contact Julie Schrader, executive director, at 507-345-9777. To learn more about LEAVE A LEGACY® Mankato Area, visit its website: www.leavelegacymankato.org.

Robert L. Crowell, former head of the Thomas Y. Crowell Company (now part of HarperCollins), died June 29, 2009, in Florida. He was 92. Crowell was the grandson of the company’s founder, who began publishing books in 1876 and was the first American publisher of Tolstoy and Gogol. Robert Crowell joined the company as a salesman in 1931, and was elected president and treasurer in 1937. He established college, secondary school, reference and children’s book divisions; many of the children’s books he published are still on the HarperCollins list, including “Chanticleer and the Fox” and the Betsy-Tacy series. He also developed the Columbia University reading course.

In addition to his career in publishing, Crowell was director of the American Book Publishing Council and a director of his alma mater’s Yale University Press.

(from Publisher’s Weekly)
WELL, of all things!” said John McCall. He folded his paper inside out, bringing uppermost the column which held the notice, and proceeded to reread it in deliberate fashion.

"Isn't it time you were making yours come true? Hunt it up. Shake—"

With a half smile on his lips, and a thoughtful look in his eyes, John McCall reached out for the telephone which stood at his elbow.

"Main 1789, please."

After a brief interval, a very faint feminine voice responded, "Hello?"

He pressed the receiver against his ear.

"Hello! Is this the Wish Room?"

"Y-Yes."

"I want to make an appointment. This is John McCall."

"When would you like to come, Mr. McCall."

"This evening?"

"This evening at 8.30?"

"If I may."

The voice became more firm.

"Yes, you may."

"But how shall I find you?"

"The Wish Room," replied the voice, human enough to rebuke his personal pronoun, "is located at Number 4000 Temple Square."

"Number 4000 Temple Square," repeated John McCall carefully. "All right. It does seem sort of queer to have a Wish Room located in such a very tangible place. I half expected to hear you say Dreamland or The End of the Rainbow."

"You must be glad," said the voice, confused but very sweet, "that it is tangible enough to reach. And you must hope that it will be material enough to help you."

"No! No! Unmaterial enough to help me. Or do I mean immaterial? I don't know."

"Think it over," said the voice, laughing, "Good-bye!"

During the afternoon, John McCall had little time to reflect either upon the mysterious Wish Room or the charming voice. But when the labors of the day were over, and he was making himself ready for dinner in his comfortable but unpretentious rooms, his mind reverted to the appointment he had made.

His wish, annoying because of its very vagueness, was at last to be revealed. He anticipated an immense amount of satisfaction in revealing it. It might be tedious, but the girl in the Wish Room would be paid to be attentive. It was absurd, but she had promised to be sympathetic. It had possibilities, and she was bound to be unprejudiced. On the whole, the arrangement pleased him.

He dined at his favorite cafe and afterward made his way to Number 4000 Temple Square, in the best of spirits. The directions took him to a much frequented part of the city. The atmosphere was as far as possible from what one might imagine that of an orthodox Wish Room to be. Surrounding lights made the streets as bright as day. Crowded cars rattled past; automobiles shot by; newsboys bawled; vendors shouted; nondescript throngs jammed the sidewalks, some hurrying and some loitering before shop windows, despite the snapping cold.

The original square, if one had ever existed, had evidently, long ago, been squeezed out in the press of things. But John McCall discovered an apartment house named for its deceased ancestor, and upon entering that, he was carried by elevator to Number 4000. He hesitated a moment before the door, then rang the bell. The possibility that the dismal hall could admit him to a satisfactory Wish Room was becoming more remote.

The maid who opened the door for him was elderly and appeared some what curious. When he had introduced himself, she said that Mr. McCall was expected, she would take his wraps, and would he come that way? John McCall assented, went that way, and as he went an amused little look came into his eyes; for the way led through just such an apartment as any but an imaginative person would have looked for. The walls were covered with oil paintings, which he fervently hoped had not been perpetrated by the hand belonging to the voice. The furniture went in "sets." The carpets were dingy, and the whole effect was most depressing. The curious maid led him down a small and poorly lighted hall, within the apartment, to a door; then pushed the door open and vanished.

John McCall's first impression of the Wish Room was that it was fragrant; and, his eyes becoming more accustomed to the sudden light, one sense corroborated the other. It blushed with flowers. His second impression was that it was bright; but upon closer survey, he saw that it was lighted only by a crackling fire and two tall cathedral candles. The brightness was the warmth of color. It was crowded, but its confusion represented comfort and luxury. As John McCall studied it, he found himself thinking—"Treasure Island." It seemed as if some one had tried to store all his treasures within these four walls. There was a variety of pictures. There were swinging shelves of books. There was a brick fireplace with a blazing log on the andirons. There was a grand piano with music on cushiony kind, and numberless warm rugs and downy pillows. And there was something else, an intangible something, which made him forget the commonplace apartment without and the hurrying crowds below.

"Mr. McCall!"

It was the voice. A slender girl, covered from head to ankles with a glistening, golden veil, had risen from one of the deep chairs by the fireplace. The man could catch the glow of eyes and the flash of color made by red lips, and from an opening at the side of her robe a hand emerged in greeting. It was a slim hand, ringless and very white. Her arm was slim too, and softly white like a white rose.

Without waiting for a response, she darted back to the fire and pulled out a cozy chair, opposite to the one from which she had just risen.

"Won't you sit down here? You must be cold." And as he acquiesced, she added somewhat timidly, "Do you smoke? Smoke then, if you like, and rest, and I will play for you."

John McCall slipped into the chair and she crossed to the piano. A moment later, he told himself that never, never before had he known what comfort was. His eye was gratified by the soft medley of color about him and the shining figure bending over the keys. The fire threw out a welcome heat. The chair in which he sat was luxurious. The perfume of flowers was in his nostrils. And his cigarette added the touch which yielded absolute perfection.

"Tell me," she said slowly, "when I get to your wish."

Then she drifted into melody. John McCall suspected that she was improvising. At any rate, he had never heard such music.

In the beginning, it was very exalted. It took him into a tall cathedral. Dusk rested on the empty pews and on the dim aisles, but in the chancel, white-robed boys were singing, and sunset light sifted through the windows upon the altar, brightening the cross. Soon, it became more martial. There were soldiers, rank on rank, file and file, tramping through the night. They were tired, hungry, thirsty, ill and homesick. But they were singing, and as they sang, they forgot all but the honor and glory of fighting for their flag. Gradually, it floated into dreams. The man was transported into fairyland. Fairies were sliding down the rainbow, shaking from flowers, slipping from the silky back of the snow-white birds that were their carriers—all come to dance in the deeps of the forest. And, perhaps because fairyland and childhood are so nearly akin, she told of childhood next. There was the music of the old mill stream, the song of wind in the tree-tops, the cry of birds, the joy of bursting forth into the glory of the morning, the joy of creeping back into the peace of evening and mother's arms, just childhood. She drew it from the keys. Then, suddenly, she found his wish. A love song was beneath her fingers, the quaintest little love song.
"You've come to it," said John McCall.

She rose swiftly, approached the fire, and sank into her chair. She crossed one glittering knee upon the other and smiled at him beneath the veil.

"Tell me about it."

He began: "I have only seen her once. I haven't the remotest idea who she is, where she lives, whether she is married or single. So far as I know, I shall never see her again. And I am in love with her. If I cannot find her, if I cannot marry her, I shall never marry anyone. I am absolutely convinced of that."

The Wish Girl leaned forward, locking her slim white hands about her knee.

"But the one time? Where was it? What did she look like? Why did you love her?"

"One day last summer," said John McCall, gazing into the fire, "One blistering hot day in August, I went down to the Public Library to look up something on spiritualism. I am a newspaper man," he added, in an explanatory tone, "and there was to be a spiritualistic convention, or something of the sort, and I wanted to know about a particular phase of the subject, before interviewing the leaders of the affair. I couldn't tell exactly what book I did want, so I got a permit to go in back, where the shelves are, and roam around at my own sweet will, looking for just what would help me. I am sort of foolish about books, anyhow." He looked up with his attractive smile, "I love to browse around. On this particular day the shelf rooms were cool and dark. I wandered along from shelf to shelf, from aisle to aisle, until I had gone so far away from all the heat and bustle that I felt in a different world.

"At last my attention was arrested by a very peculiar and pitiful sound. It came from a distant part of the immense room and I had quite a time locating it, but at last I succeeded. In one of the darkest aisles, her head in her arms on a little table, surrounded with shadows and musty, dusty books, was a girl—and she was crying. That was the sound I had heard. I—you can't think how it made me feel. I'm not very used to any kind of a woman—and there isn't another woman in the world like her."

"What did she look like?" asked the Wish Girl. She leaned back, clasping her hands behind her head, and a shimmer passed along her radiant draperies, like the shimmer that passes through a maple tree, splendid with autumn, when there is a faint breeze stirring.

"She was small," said the man dreaming, "She was small and dressed all in black. When I touched her, she raised her head and looked at me, and it was so unexpected—I shall never forget it. Her face was white, so white it broke my heart to look at it, and her eyes were like deep purple pansies with the dew on them.

"I sat down in the chair across from her and took hold of her two little hands—they were as cold as ice—and asked her what was the matter. And, because I was a stranger, she told me. Her father and mother were dead. She was living with her father's sister, and she was bitterly unhappy. She was grieving, you see, and lonesome and she said that nobody understood. She was so little and white—her eyes were so frightened—her hands were so clinging and helpless—she was such an exquisite flower of a woman—she was so different." After groping hopelessly, John McCall looked from the fire to the Wish Girl. There were tears in his eyes.

The girl bent forward.

"And your wish?"

"I—want—her."

"It will come true," breathed the Wish Girl, earnestly. "You love her, and your love will touch her, somewhere, find her, some day."

"Will it?"

"It will."

"And when I find her?"

"Take her in your arms and run off with her. It's the only way you'll ever get her. And she loves you, I know."

Angry voices broke out in the hall; swift foot steps fell; impatient fingers rattled the door. John McCall and the Wish Girl pushed back their chairs and rose. A quiver passed through the fragile form of the girl. She clasped her hands at her breast.

"Amore!" A very stout lady, bulky with furs, panting with wrath, burst in upon them. The maid's agitated countenance appeared behind her.

"What folly is this? Where did these candles come from? Who is this young man? Take off that absurd garment!"

"Auntie! Don't! My aunt, Mrs. Jessmore, Mr. McCall. When Mr. McCall is gone, auntie, I will explain."

"You will explain now."

"Here and now." Mrs. Jessmore pronounced the words with heavy brows uplifted and fat nostrils dilated.

"I—I opened a Wish Room."

"So Anna said. What, pray, is a Wish Room? And how did you dare to open anything in my absence?"

The sweet voice of the Wish Girl trembled.

"A Wish Room is a place—where people come—and pay for the privilege of—confiding—in some one. I wanted," falteringly, "to earn some money. You are kind, in your way, but I wanted some money all my own. I had no talent except that—listening to people, comforting them, advising them—"

"No talent!" stormed the indignant aunt. She had a fierce expression and a strident, disagreeable voice, before which the poor little Wish Girl shrank. "Your father spent enough money on your music."

"But I can't play, except for a few people. You know that, auntie. And father never cared—"

"That's nonsense! How many—applicants—have you had for this absurd privilege?"

"Just one," hanging her head, "Mr. McCall."

"Well then! Take off that veil. Show him that you are a civilized person. Then he may go away and stay away. I'll tend to you later."

"Oh, auntie! I can't! I won't!"

"Believe me," broke in John McCall, "There is no need of it. I will go—"

"You will stay right here until Amoret does as I say."

Mrs. Jessmore blocked the door, angry, defiant. Anna peered over her shoulder, dismayed, curious. John McCall was forced to wait, furious, raging, while the little golden girl lifted off her veil. She stood before them, drooping like a flower in a tempest.

And then—

McCall clutched the back of a chair and leaned over it, staring in utter amazement. Slowly, as if in appeal, the girl raised her eyes to meet his gaze, and they shone in her pale, little face like deep purple pansies with the dew on them. McCall's mind whirled. The words of the Wish Girl echoed in his ear—"Take her in your arms and run off with her. It's the only way you'll ever get her. And she loves you, I know."

"Mrs. Jessmore," said John McCall, "I want to introduce myself further."

"Yes?" said Mrs. Jessmore.

"I am a newspaper man, connected with the 'Times.' Also, I am an old friend of Amoret's and this affair is nothing but a joke."

"Yes?" The older woman was uncompromising.

"We might as well tell her now, mightn't we, Amoret?" asked John McCall, turning to the Wish Girl, who, divested of her glory, swayed before them.

"Tell me what?" demanded Mrs. Jessmore, bridling.

"That we are going to be married."

"But I will have something to say about that," said Mrs. Jessmore, elevating her eyebrows and widening her nostrils.

"Nothing at all," John McCall was positive.

Again the girl lifted wide, wondering eyes. The man smiled down into them, and his smile was reassuring.

"I got my instructions from a source which cannot be questioned," he added, "And I shall obey them to the letter."

"Oh, do," said Amoret.
